Early Life in the Ruins of Nueva Barcelona

Reyan Nolasco was born into the Nolasco Family, a pack of reclaimers who moved into the dead shells of cities long abandoned after quakes, plagues, and political breakdowns. They turned one of these carcasses, Nueva Barcelona, into a roughshod fortress of scaffolding, prefab shelters, and half-restored streets. The Nolasco philosophy was simple: get ahead by any means necessary, and don't waste time on morality unless it benefits the Family.

Ray grew up learning welding before reading, learning to drive construction crawlers before writing his own name. Schooling came only when someone had spare time, which wasn't often. But Ray didn't mind; he learned what mattered: engines, structural salvage, jury-rigging, and later, flying.

What he lacked was innocence. Violence and collapse were normal. Eruptions of terror, waves of refugees, drought, ethnic tension: Spain was coming apart at the seams, and Ray's world was shaped by its frayed edges.

And through all of it, the Nolasco Family whispered about old ideals, hidden plans, and an overdue revolution for true Spanish autonomy, free from the CEE's suffocating oversight and the megacorps' creeping influence. Ray didn't understand it yet, but it would define him.

Formative Sparks (2010–2013)

2010 - Killing at 14

During the violent aftershocks of Spain's wars in North Africa, anti-immigrant xenophobia peaked in the streets. When Ray was 14, he stepped between an Arab refugee friend and a knife. The scuffle was fast, desperate, and ended with the knife bleeding out in the dust.

The lawmen called it self-defense. To Ray it was the moment he realized nobody's coming to help people like them.

2011 - Whispered Connections

The Nolasco conspiracy web extended further than Ray realized. At 15, he began running messages and supplies for rebels spilling over the border from collapsing Portugal - anticorpo resisters dodging Amazonian Security death squads and Arasaka-backed enforcers. It was Ray's first taste of long-distance smuggling…and of how useful a clever Nomad could be to revolutionaries.

2013 - Water War Runner

The Great Drought hit. Andalusia shriveled. Aragon and Catalonia fought over the Ebro River. The government cracked, regions raged, and Ray was 17, old enough to handle a sand-scoured runner bike and brave enough to smuggle clean water for desperate Catalan civilians.

He dodged militia drones, corporate checkpoints, and Catalan warlords who wanted the water for themselves. It made him a legend among some and a criminal to many others. Ray liked the odds.

Into the Smuggler's Sky (2014–2017)

By 19, Ray was no longer just running roads - he was taking to the air.

2015 - Supplier of the Highwaymen

Andalusian roads turned into kill zones as highwaymen rose in retaliation against agricultural collapse. The Nolasco Family made profitable alliances, and Ray, already known for fitting cargo into places it shouldn't fit, became their main supplier. Food, biotech, weapons, water purifiers: whatever they couldn't get legally, Ray brought it in.

His piloting began on an old Trauma Team AV patched with spare parts and illegal components. He could make it dance, duck, hover – the AV always danced to Ray's tune.

2016 - The Bermeo Incident

Ray was 20 when corporate goons massacred 127 eco-protesters at Bermeo. He survived only because his AV malfunctioned and forced him to land outside the kill-box. Watching the feed later flipped a switch in his head.

From that day, Ray wasn't just anti-corp or anti-government. he was done pretending the system could be fixed. It had to be broken.

2017 - Bridges Across Continents

Ray's smuggling routes expanded into North Africa as rebel groups, crushed under Arasaka's neocolonial boots, reached out to Nomads. Ray connected Nolasco logistics with African resistance networks, learning new skies, new borders, new enemies.

He started seeing the world less as a map of nations and more as a web of oppressed peoples who needed one thing: someone to outfly the corpos.

The Brushfire Years (2018–2020)

2018 - The European Brushfire Wars

Ray was 22 when the Nolasco Pack joined the chaos in Central and Eastern Europe. Nomads fought at the margins of collapsing states, moving refugees, extracting civilians, smuggling food out of warzones. Ray flew low through artillery smoke, dodged orbital scans, and carried entire families in AVs only meant for cargo.

This is where Ray realized something:

He loved the fight as much as the cause.

2019 - The Canary Deal

Spain's political rot found a gleaming distraction: an orbital elevator project in the Canary Islands. The ESA needed transport, salvage, construction, security - everything the Nolasco Pack excelled at.

Ray negotiated part of the deal himself, and it earned him envy and respect. It also brought him closer to his personal hero: Buenaventura - the legendary revolutionary who wrote Ray a letter praising his work. Ray keeps that letter folded against his chest like armor.

2020 - Europa Sur Expansion

Portugal's corporate bloc fractured, leaving the entire region ripe for illegal trade. Europa Sur, the Mediterranean smuggling alliance, moved fast. Ray helped them push deeper into Portuguese territory, linking rebel networks, Nomad packs, and underworld syndicates all under one loose banner of anti-corp cooperation.

By 24, Ray was one of the Iberian Peninsula's best AV smugglers. Ruthless. Efficient. Unshakeably loyal to causes, not people.

Personality & Philosophy

People are tools. Use them until they stop being useful.

It’s not cruelty. Just survival. The world taught him early that relationships are currency, and currency is expendable. Only a few exceptions exist: the Nolasco Family, marginalized populations he considers “his people,” and Buenaventura, the hero who once told him Spain could be free again.

Most valued possession

A handwritten letter from Buenaventura praising Ray’s courage and warning him not to lose his soul in the fight. Ray rereads it whenever cynicism gets too loud.

Life Goals

To tear down the corporate colonization of Europe and the Mediterranean.

To undermine corrupt governments that sell out their citizens.

To arm the powerless and make them dangerous.

He knows he’ll die for these goals. He’s fine with that. After all, Saint Nolasco’s final words were: `Oh, how good it feels to die redeemed.`

Enemies of Ray

Governments, especially Spain’s corrupt parliamentarians

Corporate executives, especially Arasaka, Amazonian Security, and the agricorps

Anyone who threatens Spanish autonomy or tries to exploit Nomad territory

They want Ray dead because he knows their routes, their secrets, their crimes - and because he won’t stop.

Current Status (2020)

Ray Nolasco is a skilled, fearless and creative AV smuggler and Nomad revolutionary. He is young, hungry, and shaped by two and a half decades of war, collapse, revolt, and corporate predation. To some, he's a hero; to others, a terrorist. To himself, he's something simpler:

A weapon aimed at the people who deserve it.
